CRITICAL PERSPECTIVES ON CONTEMPORARY ART AND CULTURE

An Architecture of Memory

Rashmi Meenakshi Viswanathan

In this essay, I argue that the series capitalizes on the distinct ontologies of Warli and landscape photographic traditions and their performances in the contemporary imagination, to construct alternative architectures of memory. I draw from the recent 'spatial turn' in visual cultural studies, which links the intellection of space (both physical and photographic) to the formation of personal, cultural, and body memory, to analyze how the artists redraw conventional lines between the photographic past and the present.

"Memories Come to Rajesh", 2014

Introduction

In a photograph, I see a man's back, Rajesh Vangad, a self-described tribal artist of the Warli tradition of Western Maharashtra and creator of the overpainted tableau. He sits astride his motorcycle not far from an embankment, past which a silver stream cuts a path through a landscape energized by the teeming presence of figures carrying on with their daily activities – farming, playing, and milling about. Travelers crossing the silver stream support their luggage with arms upraised, and a motorcyclist and rider power their way up the picture field and the countryside, gesturing to a range of spatial trajectories and dimensionalities that pierce the flatness of the filmic surface. This is part of a larger series of conceptual and artistic collaborations between the photographer Gauri Gill and Vangad, entitled Fields of Sight, begun in 2013.¹ With this paper, I look at their unusual collision of physical and psychic topographies, achieved through the layering of black ink drawing over black and white photography. Combining two visual media with distinct histories, ontologies, and discursive frameworks, Fields of Sight breaks ground as a new history of embodied landscape.

The Memory Tour

Begun in 2013, Fields of Sight emerged organically from sustained interactions between the two artists. Vangad's family hosted Gill in his native village of Ganjad in Western Maharashtra, India, while she worked locally on another photographic project. During Gill's stay, Vangad took his guest around the places he had grown up, ambling about the environs, fields, factory sites, and lakes of Ganjad. Experiencing a memory tour of sorts, Gill took up the camera to photograph Vangad's home and objects of reminiscence. Gill explained to me that her photographs of the tour struck her as incomplete, missing Vangad's experience of space. Acknowledging and seeking to visualize their discrete experiences of space, Vangad and Gill embarked upon Fields of Sight, featuring Vangad's drawings on Gill's photographs. Mining experiential fracture as the productive space of co-creation, the works regularly feature Vangad in the landscapes, inhabiting a photographic and drawn universe of forms and space. This project was initially comprised of twenty pictures, which were exhibited at the Kolkata-based Experimenter gallery in 2014. It has grown since, now at 40 photographic paintings. According to Gill, this project may yet see further additions, forming an elastic and open-ended project.

This is not Gill's first venture into collaborative practice. In her series Balika Mela (2003/2010) Gill set up a make-shift booth at a local fair for teen girls, where portrait sitters were invited to coordinate their presentation, choosing their accompanying props, backgrounds, and positioning. These portraits are marked by the agency of the young women in their self-presentation. Even her project entitled 1984, released in 2013, a combination of photographic prints by Gill, excerpts from newspaper articles addressing the anti-Sikh pogrom of 1984, and responses to the pogrom and its media coverage provided by contemporary artists, provides a multi-perspective explanatory framework.

As a descriptor, Fields is an index of three things – the physical places viewed by Gill and Vangad, their distinct psychic experiences of space, and their distinct representational practices. It is an acknowledgement of the variability of Gill and Vangad's experiences and arts – a poetic exploration of cognition, perception, and representation. Consequently, formal readings of the works flatten the conceptual complexity of Fields of Sight, incapable of providing explanatory frameworks for art works that are both transcriptions of space and embodied experience.

The Problem with Gill and Vangad

The problems with discussing such a collaboration are multi-fold. Iconographic analyses of the landscape and over-drawings tends to locate the media in two distinct traditions, pulling Vangad's drawings into conversation with Warli artistic precedent and away from Gill's photographed landscapes. Gill's photographs, functionally the support for Vangad's work, are inextricable from the web of drawn images that cover their surfaces. Placing the two mediums within a unified iconographic analysis obscures the artists' different interventions, and fixes the oscillating meanings of the photographs – the plurality of fields – with one meaning.

Rare in contemporary art, Fields of Sight features the use of drawings that cull from visual traditions that have until recently been relegated to pre-modern craft performance in contemporary arts discourse, and photographs, which are placed within the modern (both as a technology and a representational medium).³ Though contemporary practices often reference historical visual traditions, they are invariably the result of single authorship, and participate in the archival impulse that inflects much contemporary art.⁴ As a result, their aesthetic frameworks may be ably subject to translational readings (among others) – interpretive methods that permit the analysis of the visual traditions with which the artist engages as well as the transformative effects of the (single) artist’s interventions.⁵

“Moonlight in the Forest,” an overpainted photograph featured in the project demonstrates the productive challenge of entering into Fields of Sight through discrete readings of Vangad and Gill’s forms, concepts, or iconographies. Furthermore, its composition foregrounds the conceptual layering of Fields of Sight – the complicity of Gill, Vangad, as well as the photographic viewer in generating meaning. Vangad stands in the mid-ground of the picture field, with his head turned away from the camera. The profusion of vegetal imagery imaginatively suggests Vangad’s focus on depths of forest inaccessible to the photograph’s viewer. The life drawn into and onto the landscape weaves an organic net over the photographic surface – organic both because of its subject matter and its hand-drawn style (which might be considered ‘organic’ at least compared to the camera’s technological language). The teeming veneer and the crescent drawn into the upper picture field solicit the viewer’s eye to view the metallic day sky of the print as the silver incandescence of moonlight.

Vangad's stance, turned away from the photograph and toward an invisible place beyond the photographic horizon, mimics the viewer's own inquiry into the photograph, fostering one's self-identification with his unmasking gaze. His positioning sets up a range of temporal distances; through the image of Vangad one looks forward and away (at the future – at things just beyond the horizon), yet backwards, at his perpetual recovery of experience. The viewer is participating in the rethinking of space and the transformation of a photographed landscape into a topography of embodied memory. Placed on the universalizing space of the photograph, his memory then becomes a memory of land experienced by the art viewer. The viewer is given the privileged position of being caught in the photographic world of hidden things, a poetic space that is haptic rather than restrictively visual, intensive rather than extensive, habitable rather than solely observable. 6

Similarly, in "Night Journey of Forest Dwellers" the artists deny the possibility of a singular reading through strategic renderings of space. The omnipresence of the forest dwellers, whose black outlines ground them within the pictured black and white landscape, suffuses the photograph with Vangad's memory of land – creating an atmosphere of Vangad's generation. His slight hunch takes on a proprietary attitude among the creatures, which both kindles my self-identification and its converse, my voyeuristic distance. As he looks down, I look down at the things that make themselves known to him (and to me), and the surreptitious creatures that are realized on the photographic form.

Gill's framings, which are vast and infrequently draw attention to the foreground, further open the immersive capacity of the works. In "Harvest II" and "River" among other works, her frames allow the viewer to move into their not-as-yet-visible depths in an imaginative resistance of rational time and photographic space. Challenging the conventionality of rural landscape-documentary photographs, a genre with rich colonial roots and touristic resonance, Gill's engagement with land is intimate, unexpected, and determined by Vangad's selection of spaces to memorialize. Defying the 'non-style' of the snapshot aesthetic, Gill and Vangad foreground aestheticism as a documentary proposition. They redirect the orientation of the artwork from the picturing of land to the experience of space. Through the depiction of sweeping receding fields within which Vangad is most often featured alone, Gill foregrounds the silence of the photograph, training a view on the 'nearness' of his lived experience, while still instantiating the insurmountable distance of representation.

A Practice of Time and Space

Imagine the road as a pathway that draws your eyes and sense of the scope of the land deep into the photograph, into an infinitely receding village that exists beneath the metropolis. The drawn forms sheathe the surface of the photograph, forming a vertical counterpoint to the patently horizontal arc of the road. The photograph and the drawings form planes that intersect at the horizon, constructing a dimensionality and palpability – an architecture of memory constructed from distinct spatial practices and materialities.

"To the City", 2015

Whereas Warli art has historically sheathed architectural forms, requiring the viewer to shift her body and the angles of her gaze to accommodate the unfolding forms, the photograph is intelligible within one glance, encouraging its viewers to stand fixed and gaze into it.⁷ The artists use these historical differences to advantage; playing with alternative and even contrasting rationalizations of space, the artists' collaboration constructs a new architecture of memory. In 'To the City' the foreshortened length of a roadway emerges from and forms the base of the photographic field, tapering in the center, arterially linking the village and the city. Carrying processions of migrants netted in rows, the pathway invites the viewer's eyes to the horizon line, where roadways thick with traffic cut intersecting paths across a similarly bustling sky. The work is rendered in multiple perspectives; the photographed road is frontal and roughly at eye level, perpendicularly intersecting with aerial views of urban highways and largely frontal views of high-rises. The climb of the urbanized sky is vertiginous against the concave pull of the roadway. The perspectives offset time, rendering it sticky, slow and thick. While the repetition of migrant bodies and their unceasing presence might normally suggest their perpetual movement, their entombment within the roadway traps them within a singular stillness. The presence of the urban scape looming within a blank sky simultaneously suggests a vision of a future city and a city that is perpetually coming into being. Bearing the bodies of hundreds of hourglass figures similarly rendered, luggage in hand, temporality is further disturbed. The processional aspect of their depiction rejects temporal specificity; this has taken place, is still taking place, and is perhaps perennially taking place as a portrait of emigration. Mundane temporality is denied in favor of what seems to be a heavier acknowledgement of the fundamental rupture in Ganjad time, caused by the urban migration that is now typical of rural India, as the nation becomes an increasingly industrial and service economy.

Their collaboration sets up alternative relationships between photography and time, through a range of pictorial strategies that counter their expected (modern) relationship. In images such as 'Worship of the Great Serpent Who Lives in the Home of Ants.' Vangad's visions suggest a spectral point of origin within a range of depths in the photograph, at odds with the unitary perspective and remove of the photograph. The drawings extract subjects from the sticky depth of the photograph, not only releasing them from the logics of photographic time, but also productively challenging the implicit modernity of photographically rationalized representation. They can radiate from the centre of the image, countering the internal pull of the photographic image. They energize the surface of the photograph (and patently draw attention to the surface plane). The ink-drawn figures pit their 'print climbing' against the promised depth of the photographic picture field.⁸ Consequently, the photographic referents are also set free from the implied depths of the photograph and other perspectival centers are articulated, opening up the photograph as a site of multiple meanings.⁹

If the photograph is a deterritorialized rendering of space, then Fields of Sight is the resituating of land to the fields of personal and social memory.¹⁰ If the landscape as a photographic genre is the modern rationalization of foreign space, then Vangad's photographic presence, Gill and Vangad's competing perspectives, and their compositional collaborations assert a different kind of modern, one that is intimate, opaque, experiential, and uncertain.

3 Exhibitions including the incisive 2005/2006 Edge of Desire: Recent Art of India feature the works of Adivasi artists who 'preserve the 'look' of craft traditions within a contemporary market economy.' Playfully placed under the category of 'Recycled Futures,' the art is examined as a contemporary reframing of Adivasi practices, thereby leaving the local values, performances, and meanings of the idioms used for another discussion. 4 The 'archival impulse' is characterized by Hal Foster as a pervasive philosophical attitude of much contemporary art, that reconstitutes glyphs from a range of historical periods, discourses, eras, and cultural milieus, into an 'archival sampling' of sorts. Here, I refer to artists whose practices seek to displace or reconstruct the archives, subverting institutionalized idioms or drawing from marginalized or counter-institutional practices to reframe the terms of visual culture and its histories, see Ai Weiwei's Coca-Cola Vase, 2014

5 Here, I draw attention to the scholarship of Bruno Latour, who proposes a rhizomatic model for the analysis of authorship and agency. Specifically, viewed through his concept of the mediator, which positions entities as both actors and things that are acted upon, the artist's re-direction of pre-existing artistic idioms (the process of translation) may be studied in terms of both the idiom's histories and the artist's agency in its reference. 6 Gilles Deleuze and Félix Guattari's construction of 'smooth space,' a nomadic space of knowledge and experience that runs counter to those of the state (constituting the 'striated space'), profitably describes the poetic topologies of Fields of Sight. They ascribe to the latter extensivity, or observable properties that are divisible, such as height and weight, and to the former, intensivity, deep properties that cannot be halved nor changed without altering the constitution of a thing. In so doing, the authors provide an opposition between the regimentation ('striated space') of the vision of the camera, with its unidirectional gaze and illusions of fore-, mid-, and backgrounds, and the 'smooth space' of the immersive depth and the multiple gazes from within and without, of the overpainted photographs.

8 Now a recognized poststructuralist reading of the photograph, the photograph is positioned as a patently modern representational instrument that renders space and time rationalized and legible, thereby constructing the grounds of modern knowledge. 10 This reading of Fields of Sight draws from the theories of the philosopher Gilles Deleuze, who describes an inherent relationship between the unitary and fixed perspective of modern representation and modernity's claims to fixed, rational knowledge: 'Representation fails to capture the affirmed world of difference. Representation has only a single centre, a unique and receding perspective, and in consequence a false depth. It mediates everything, but mobilizes and moves nothing. Movement for its part implies a plurality of centres, a superposition of perspectives, a tangle of points of view, a coexistence of moments which essentially distort representation.' Difference and Repetition, trans Paul Patton, Athlone Press, London, 1994, p 55–56
